Market Review

Equities Rose Despite Higher Yields and Central Bank Caution

The first quarter was a strong period for stock market returns, with positive returns in each month. The driver was very much valuation expansion with the European index converging upon long-term normalised levels, whilst earnings estimates have broadly been holding up in Europe which is better than many other regions. This year had an unusual starting point of measured earnings expectations of flattish full-year growth as opposed to the usual over optimism. The European yield curve remains inverted and we saw an increase in yields in the middle of the curve with the German ten-year rising 28 bps to 2.3% and a slight pushout of the timing of the first interest rate cut.

Medium term inflation expectations have been broadly unchanged over the quarter, but monthly headline inflation data has seen a decline from a reading of 2.9% for December to 2.4% for March. Core inflation remains higher at 3.1%, falling from 3.7% in December, with the European Central Bank focused on the outlook for wage growth. Wholesale gas prices have remained measured falling from €32 MWh in December to €27.3 MWh at the end of the quarter, at roughly equivalent levels to just before the invasion of the Ukraine. Electricity prices have significantly declined, German baseload one-month forward prices fell 40% from the end of last year to €54 MWh.

Q4 2023 MARKET REVIEW

January was propelled by a very strong performance by the technology sector. Bond yields made a strong upward inflection for most of the month before regressing in the final week. Central bank comments were more in the direction of delaying the timing of the first rate cut, with the ECB's chair Christine Lagarde stating the ECB remains 'data dependent, not date dependent'. Euro area GDP flash estimate remained sequentially unchanged for Q4 2023 and 0.1% YoY, later confirmed by the final estimate, disappointing in Germany but exceeding expectations in Spain and Italy. We saw a stronger than expected manufacturing PMI at 46.6 for January, whilst services were sequentially weaker at 48.4.

European equities moved higher in February despite bond yields having a relatively sharp upward move, with the Bund ten-year yield adding 25bps to 2.41% amidst central banks becoming more hawkish. Euro area inflation dropped from 2.8% in January to 2.6%, marginally higher than expected. Inflation components are being supported by the services sector inflation at 3.9% driven by the continued strength in wages, whilst fresh food price inflation has fallen to 2.2%, the lowest since 2021. Gas prices continued to fall in February from €30.5 to €24.9 MWh, which indicates that an electricity price tailwind is growing both for disinflation and for the economy. We had very strong jobs data in the US early in the month, where the economy added 353,000 jobs, almost twice as many as forecast and led to economists pushing out their expectations for rate cuts closer to the summer. Within the Eurozone Unemployment remains at the lowest ever level at 6.4%.

March was another strong month for European equities, cementing five months of sequential positive returns. The ECB hinted that it would wait until June before making the first interest rate cut and emphasised the importance of the wage data to the decision. Staff forecasts saw a decline in inflation expectations this year to 2.3% and GDP to 0.6%; whilst expecting inflation to be at 2% and 1.9% in the following two years. The Swiss National Bank unexpectedly cut rates by 25bps to 1.5%, leading to further weakness in the Swiss franc. Consumer confidence data increased as expected in March, highlighting the benefits of real wage growth are being seen.

As has been a theme over recent quarters we saw pronounced dispersion in sector performance, against the index (non-12pm adjusted) rising 7.8% in euro terms. Technology outperformed by a significant 10.2%, followed by consumer discretionary at 6.1% and financials which outperformed by 4.3%. Utilities was the largest underperformer by 13.9% versus the index falling 6.1% in absolute terms. Other more defensive areas underperformed led by consumer staples underperforming the index by 10.9% and Energy by 7.8%.

Current Positioning

Holding with technology, adding to financials

As at the end of the quarter the main overweights are in technology, communication services and industrials. The largest underweights are in consumer discretionary, financials and energy.

We did mitigate the size of the underweight to financials over the quarter by adding exposure predominantly to banks and also to the holding in AXA. Having recently seen a number of the sector bellwethers, we recognise that whilst the outlook is not one of significant growth from here it appears the cost of risk will stay lower for longer and shareholder distributions will be sustained. Given interest rates have peaked and will likely start to fall, we are happy remaining with an overall underweight position. We also reduced the utilities exposure, with our only remaining position being Veolia Environment.

Outlook

Low valuations, Relative Opportunity Drawing Investor Interest

Equity markets have continued to power on despite the push back of the timing of the first interest rate cuts and the rise in yields at the long end of the curve. We feel that Europe's relative positioning versus other parts of the globe is improving given the modest valuations, still at some of the widest discounts versus MSCI World, and the overall undemanding levels of expectation.

see some positioning risk in some of Europe's large cap winners we absolutely do not think these should be jettisoned. The likes of ASML and Novo Nordisk have performed well because they are great companies, with broad moats, with lots of growth and high returns. On the more cyclical side of things, we have added a little to IT services, travel and construction, but these are cyclicals backed by positive thematic drivers. Defensive stocks have lagged but largely suffer from a lack of growth, we see interest in certain consumer staples such as the brewers.

Amidst a backdrop where geopolitical uncertainty is high and possibly set to rise with a Trump election win, we see European equities relatively well placed. We are seeing a pickup of investor interest in Europe itself, with positioning still incredibly modest, realising that a relative opportunity is starting to present itself.

We know that GDP growth is set to be weak this year with consensus forecasting just 0.5%, but the mechanics should be in place to see a decent incremental rebound in 2025. This will be driven by improving consumer confidence, rising global Manufacturing PMIs and of course the overall tailwind of some monetary easing. Consumer confidence is supported by the lowest levels of unemployment, rising wages and falling inflationary headwinds from food and electricity. We expect European interest rates to start falling from the early summer period, but unusually we believe it is possible that Europe cuts before the US, given the recent strength in a broad range of US activity and monetary data. In a nutshell, Europe may well get the monetary stimulus more quickly than others.

Within the equity market we are likely to see a modest tailwind for more cyclical areas and at the margin small and midcap stocks, the latter we have modestly added to. The tailwind is set to be incremental rather than forceful, therefore whilst we
